Keep the Focus on the Children

Remember that the children are the main reason all of your participants are at the meeting. By focusing on the common investment in the children’s well-being, you can help support good planning with the family.

How will you include the children’s voices?

- Arrange for participants to bring pictures of the child
- Play a videotape or audiotape of the child
- Have the child draw pictures of the family or the situation and bring these to the meeting
- Read a letter from the child
- Arrange a conference call
- Have a spokesperson for the child
- Bring an item that belongs to the child such as a favorite toy or article of clothing
- Invite participants to tell a story about the child
- Use the empty chair technique
- Have the child attend for the beginning, closing, or meal time during the meeting
• Have the child complete the worksheet “I Want to Say Something!” and share this at the meeting
• Share the child’s artwork in a brief power point presentation
• Play the child’s favorite song

When a child will be present at the meeting:

• Prepare them well. See handout “Preparing Young People for Child and Family Teams”
• Be sure they have a support person
• Arrange for a trained person to use the “one-step removed” approach (puppet, toy, etc.) to get the child’s views
• Consider arranging cues for the child to signal discomfort, needing a break, etc.
• Create ground rules with the special needs of the child in mind
• Be sure the facilitator is tuned in to the child’s non-verbal cues
• Keep the conversation oriented to the child’s level of understanding
• Be sure participants are not “talking over” the child or acting like they’re not present
• Acknowledge that it can be difficult for a child to speak in a room full of adults
• Make sure the room is child friendly
• Bring crayons, paper, and fidget toys for the child to use
• Commend the child for participating and offer encouragement
• Check in with the child after the meeting
